Curcuma longa (Turmeric Root) Turmeric has been cultivated and used in South and Southeast Asian traditions for thousands of years, appearing in Ayurvedic and traditional Chinese texts where it was historically prepared to support comfort in the throat, chest, and nasal passages, and applied topically for skin and tissue wellbeing. Researchers have extensively studied Curcuma longa for its effects on the body's natural inflammatory signaling pathways, with peer-reviewed literature examining how its primary compound, curcumin, interacts with immune-related and microbial processes.

Mentha spicata (Spearmint) Spearmint has a long history of use across European, Middle Eastern, and North American herbal traditions, where it was historically prepared to support respiratory ease, digestive comfort, and general cooling during times of illness or discomfort. Researchers have studied Mentha spicata for its effects on respiratory mucosal tissue and microbial pathways, and botanical literature has explored how its volatile compounds — particularly carvone and limonene — interact with the body's natural immune and airway-related processes.

Citrus aurantifolia (Lime) Lime has been used in tropical and subtropical herbal traditions for centuries, particularly across Southeast Asia, the Caribbean, and Latin America, where the fruit, rind, and juice were historically prepared to support cooling, throat comfort, and respiratory ease. Researchers have studied Citrus aurantifolia for its effects on immune-modulating and antioxidant pathways, with botanical literature examining how its flavonoids and vitamin C content interact with the body's natural defenses and mucosal tissue.
